What Is the Scope of the Bill of Rights?

BACKGROUND ESSAY

The Bill of Rights lists the rights guaranteed to American citizens, but what about the rights not listed? What if the rights of one person limit the rights of another person? The Ninth Amendment states: “The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” This means that just because certain rights are listed in the Constitution does not mean that people do not have other, unlisted rights. The Founders believed that the Ninth Amendment was needed to make sure that citizens’ rights were not limited to the rights listed in the Constitution or Bill of Rights.

What Is the Ninth Amendment’s Purpose?

The Ninth Amendment ensures that the rights listed in the Bill of Rights are not assumed to be more important than rights not listed. The Ninth Amendment does not list any specific rights, but it raises many possibilities. It has been interpreted to protect all natural rights not specifically listed in the First through Eighth Amendments.

There are questions as to whether some personal liberty rights are truly natural rights. Further, many ask who should decide whether a right exists. If the Constitution does not specifically list a right, should judges be the ones to say whether it exists? Or should it be up to the people and their elected representatives? There is no right to drive a car listed in the Bill of Rights. Some people claim, though, that the Ninth Amendment protects citizens’ right to drive. The Supreme Court has been hesitant to use Ninth Amendment claims alone when deciding cases. They have looked for more support for rights in the Bill of Rights and Constitution.

Is There a Right to Privacy?

People often talk about a right to privacy. This right is not among the rights listed in the Bill of Rights or elsewhere in the Constitution, but most people believe that privacy and the right to make personal choices are part of being free. The Supreme Court has indeed found that some kinds of privacy are rights that the Ninth Amendment protects.

Modern “privacy” law began in 1965. The Supreme Court cited the Ninth Amendment when it struck down a state law banning the use of birth control. The ban applied to married couples as well as singles.

In Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), the Court said that the Ninth Amendment protects privacy in marriage. The Court said, “We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights...To hold that a right so basic and fundamental and so deep-rooted in our society as the right of privacy in marriage may be infringed [violated] because that right is not guaranteed in so many words (specifically) by the first eight amendments... is to ignore the Ninth Amendment and to give it no effect whatsoever.”

Like most cases about the Ninth Amendment, the Court found further constitutional support for its decision. In Griswold, the Court cited the First, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Amendments as creating a “zone of privacy.”

What Are Reproductive Rights?

The Supreme Court built on Griswold and the zone of privacy. It used the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments in the reasoning of Roe v. Wade (1973). It upheld a right to privacy when it recognized a woman’s right to an abortion. “This right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action, as we feel it is, or, as the District Court determined, in the Ninth Amendment’s reservation of rights to the people, is broad enough to encompass [include] a woman’s decision whether or not to terminate [end] her pregnancy.”

Some argue that the Court decided Roe v. Wade incorrectly. They argue that the Constitution does not mention the issue of abortion. Because of this, they believe that the Court should have deferred to state laws addressing the issue. As the Tenth Amendment maintains, “The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.” Others believe life begins at conception and that the embryo or fetus has inalienable rights. They argue that a woman’s privacy rights need to be balanced against the right to life of the embryo, fetus, or unborn child.

Do You Have a Right to Die? To Take Drugs?

Other personal liberty issues continue to be debated. Like the cases of Griswold and Roe, many personal liberty cases hinge on privacy. For that reason, they are often about actions that are personal and intimate. For example, the Court said states could outlaw homosexual activity in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), but reversed this decision in Lawrence v. Texas (2003). In United States v. Windsor (2013), the Court determined that the Defense of the Marriage Act was unconstitutional. The decision meant that the federal government must recognize same-sex marriages and same-sex spouses equally.

Few things are as personal as death. Should terminally ill people be able to ask their doctor to help them die? The Court has rejected a doctor’s argument that a person has a constitutional right to physician-assisted suicide. States could allow assisted suicide, the Court said, but the Constitution granted no such right.

Some people demand that they have a right to take the medicine they want, even ones that have not been approved by the United States Food and Drug Administration. Opponents argue that the federal government has a duty to make sure all of the country’s medicine is safe and effective.

The debate surrounding Ninth Amendment issues continues today. How should the Court decide whether certain individual rights exist? Should natural law, the Founders’ intent, or the Constitution guide the Supreme Court? Or should these issues be decided by local communities and legislatures?

James Madison said, “In Republics, the great danger is, that the majority may not sufficiently respect the rights of the minority.” The questions raised by the Ninth Amendment—what these rights truly are—are ones that will continue to challenge Americans.

Comprehension Questions

1. What is the purpose of the Ninth Amendment in protecting the rest of the rights listed in the Bill of Rights?

2. According to the Supreme Court, how does the Ninth Amendment protect privacy?

3. How did the Court rule in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), Lawrence v. Texas (2003), and United States v. Windsor (2013)? How has the interpretation of the Ninth Amendment changed over time?
